

I think sometimes it's easier to love someone than to believe they could love you back.

Because loving someone is something you can do from a distance. You can admire them, choose them, care about them, and never have to confront the uncomfortable question of why they would choose you too.

But being loved means letting someone see you without the distance.

And that's terrifying.

Because once someone says, "I know you. I've seen the difficult parts, the insecure parts, the parts you try to hide, and I still choose you,” you have to decide whether you believe them.

And sometimes I think we’re so used to searching for the reason someone will leave that we don’t know what to do when someone gives us a reason to stay.

There are billions of people in this world. Billions of faces, personalities, lives, possibilities.

And somehow, someone looked at you and said, “You.”

Maybe the hard part isn’t finding someone who loves you.

Maybe the hard part is believing that they had every opportunity to choose someone else, and they still chose you.