

If I asked you to name everything you love, how long would it take to name yourself?

Most people hesitate to put themselves on that list, lost in the idea that loving oneself is selfish or somehow undeserved. We're quick to express love for family, friends, passions, and even material things. But when it comes to ourselves, we often fall silent. It's as if we, too, forget we deserve the same care and compassion we so easily give to others.

But maybe the real question is this: Why do we think we're the exception to our own humanity?

Why do we imagine that everyone else is worthy of gentleness while we alone must earn it? The truth is, self-love is not an indulgence, it's an anchor. Without it, we drift, looking for validation in places that cannot hold us. With it, we stand rooted, not because we think we're flawless, but because we finally recognize our own inherent worth.

Loving yourself isn't arrogance; it's alignment.

It's choosing to treat yourself as someone who matters, not more than others, but certainly not less. It's acknowledging that the person who carries your thoughts, your memories, your quiet fears and wild hopes... deserves kindness from you most of all.

And perhaps the moment you finally place your own name on that list is the moment you realize it should have been there from the beginning.